

Idea:

An introductory primer of these concepts can be found in a book entitled, A Deadly Misunderstanding. This concept has been endorsed by numerous diplomatic, political, military and religious leaders, among them, former Secretary of State James Baker, saying they offered;

A blueprint for breaking this logjam of dissention that contributes to so much (religious) conflict today.

Trac5 has developed a unique and field-tested model for discreetly engaging key political and religious leaders in conflict-prone regions where freedoms are most threatened. To scale, Trac5 is proposing a hybrid-sector Crisis Response Team. Utilizing the framework of this model allows for the fulfillment of a deeply personal, faith-based diplomacy factor that is critical, especially as it relates to religious equality and peace.

Trac5 can pivot to promote transformative publications or curriculums founded upon groundbreaking linguistic research and newly discovered religious common ground. These ideas catalyze paradigms which undermine the doctrinal ideologies that generate radicalization, persecution and conflict. Scrutinized by scholars on all sides, this well-tested model systematically disassembles the religious motivation for persecution.

A partnership among Trac5 and existing diplomatic, business, educational and humanitarian resources, will bring the Trac5 model to necessary scale. Trac5 also brings to the partnership extensive experience and relational networks in the Abrahamic cultures most involved in the underlying problems.

Trac5's mission is to address the religious factors that are awkward or inappropriate for the public sector, thus carefully cultivating the interfaith reconciliation, freedom and peace that are essential prerequisites to obtaining the objectives of U.S. foreign policy.
